

An Exceedingly Brief Introduction to Spanish Vocabulary and Phrases.

Pronunciation and a few Grammatical Rules:

Spanish is a beautiful and complex language with one of the largest vocabularies and most wonderful literatures in the world – clearly you will not master Spanish in a few lessons! But Spanish is superior to English for at least one reason (and unquestionably more) in that it has relatively simple, and more or less universal, pronunciation rules that, once learned, greatly facilitate speaking. Spanish contains 25 simple (all those in English less ‘w’) and 4 compound letters (ch = che, ll = elle, ñ = eñe, and rr = erre). We will practice the various sounds that the letters make when we meet (some consonants assume a different sound depending on their placement in a word). Accent (or stress) varies according to set rules. In words ending in a vowel or ‘n’ or ‘s’, the stress is on the penultimate syllable. In words ending in a consonant, stress is on the last syllable, and if the word has an accent then this indicates the placement of the stress. With diphthongs and triphthongs (2 or 3 vowels together), all letters are pronounced although different combinations of strong (‘a’, ‘e’, and ‘o’) and weak (‘u’ and ‘i’) vowels may assume different pronunciations. Spanish has many idioms. Moreover, the accent and vocabulary can vary significantly among (and even within countries). I gained my modest capacity in Spanish in nw. Argentina where I have spent 3 years, and I don’t pretend to be expert in Mexican usage of the language. I also wrote this largely from memory so forgive errors in spelling, accents or grammar.
